A brilliant display of bands or folds of variously colored light in the sky at night, especially in polar regions. Charged particles from the solar wind are channeled through the Earth's magnetic field into the polar regions. There the particles collide with atoms and molecules in the upper atmosphere, ionizing them and making them glow.

By Rev. Wu Li. Supposedly long ago in a land that might be far, far away, the notoriously cryptic oracle at Delphi proclaimed Socrates the wisest dude in all the kingdom, explaining in its self-important way, because he alone knew that he did not know. Puzzled by the always confusing oracle which seemed to delight in pompously spouting meaningless nonsense to the world at large, Socrates merely ...
